Support For Families:

Whether it's addiction or a mental illness, family support is often critical to successful, long-term recovery. When patients feel supported by even one close family member, they tend to do better in treatment. They also tend to achieve better long-term, health outcomes. But family members need love and support, too—and can also benefit from being part of the recovery process. And, when families have the mental health and recovery supports that they need in order to exercise self-care, they are more able to extend healthy love and support to their loved one with addiction and/or mental illness.
